Expert Interpretation of Profile

Alex Morrison -- VISIONARY / CREATIVE -- June 13, 2026

This document contains the licensed psychologist's expert reading of this client's behavioral profile -- written specifically for use before the first meeting, during the design process, and at moments of conflict. It is calibrated to the Visionary / Creative profile as identified through the PreForma intake questionnaire.

WHO THIS CLIENT IS

You're sitting across from someone who sees the world differently from you -- and who considers that an advantage. They're not unrealistic. They're simply used to intuition preceding analysis, and to their dreams sometimes proving right. That gives them the courage to propose things that look like too much at first glance -- but also a tendency to underestimate what it actually costs to realize them.

Don't try to rein in their vision or narrow it at the start of the project, because that shuts down communication. Let them talk, ask, propose. Your job isn't to immediately say what's possible -- it's to listen carefully and then, calmly and without drama, define what goes into this project and what doesn't.

WHAT DETERMINES THE SUCCESS OF THIS PROJECT

What makes this client valuable -- and demanding at the same time -- is that you can't lead them through standard processes. They need a story, not a plan. A presentation that starts 'according to the technical specification' loses them in the second sentence. A presentation that starts by describing how someone will feel when they walk into that space -- that holds their attention and opens the door to discussing details.

Scope creep is your biggest risk. Every new idea that appears during the project must have a visible price tag and timeline -- not as a warning, but as information. Visionaries often don't understand why a 'small change' costs money -- your job is to explain it without conflict, through a conversation about value, not rules.

AESTHETIC PREFERENCES AND PRESENTATION LANGUAGE

Aesthetically, this client lives in the image before the space exists. They come with references, saved photos, a Pinterest board that says more about them than they could articulate in words. Don't underestimate those references -- that's not a copy-paste approach to design, that's the emotional language through which they're telling you what they want to feel. Your job is to translate that feeling into a space, not to convince them that the feeling is wrong or unachievable.
